Yellow Fever in Boston in 1798---Intense Heat of the Weather. Boston, for the last half century, at least, has been visited by no severe epidemic. One reason for this is, the wise precaution which established a thorough system of sewerage; and another, the regulations adopted for relieving it of filth and rubbish always accumulating in a great city. The yellow fever, which has so often ravaged New Orleans, and is now so awfully fatal in Norfolk and Portsmouth, has, as we learn from Dr. Clark, city physician, visited Boston within the past sixty years four times, viz: in 1798, 1802, 1819 and 1835: and it is quite a remarkable fact, that it has exhibited itself in and about the same locality on every occasion, in the neighboorhood of Fort Hill, being apparently evolved from miasmatic materials, which, from the experience of the year of cholera, 1849, there is reason to suppose are still deposited in the imperfectly drained streets about the lower parts of the Hill. The most severe visitation of yellow fever in Boston was in 1798, but the mortality that then took place was not of a magnitude sufficient to account for the general panic that ensued, and which, for a month or two, nearly destroyed business, and almost depopulated the city. One old resident, then a clerk, says that at the time he lived on Beacon Hill, with two other clerks, no business was doing, and from tobacco, and on the excursion hardly a soul was met and their enlarged stories spread the panic far and wide, one of them asserting that so infected was the air that a piece of beef exposed for a few moments turned putrid.

The first case of fever occurred on the 21st of June, in Forel street, near the Market Place. Here they will save themselves expense and spare us the necessity | Mr. Stoddard, his wife and daughter, died of the disorder. After this, no case was reported until the 21st of July, when it appeared on Codman's wharf, an appendage of the Market Place, several adults dying. It then spread upon Fort Hill, and continued COURT OF PLEAS AND QUARTER SESSIONS, SEPT. TERM, 1855. to prevail with more or less violence until the middle of October, when it was completely checked by a northeast storm of three days' continuance. Of the number that perished nothing certain is known. The pamphlet in question gives the names of three hundred adult deceased, but adds that the children are not included, and the list is by no means complete. So violent was it in the early stages, that not one of twenty who took the disease was saved. Scarcely a family escaped it. In one family five out of six final will be rendered against him and the land sold to satisfy perished. One house in Purchase street, from the mortality which occurred there, was denominated the coffin. A sexton visiting it found the last tenant a woman of some wealth and station in the community. dying alone, her relatives and friends having al was seized upon Long whart, and was in the last weather was intensely hot.

Of Fort Hill, the place of the great mortality, the account says that it is underlaid with clay upon a thin soil, and is speedly surcharged with a putrid residuum, which the clay prevents from being carried off There were, also, vast amounts of filth in the In one case it was found necessary to pour several hogshead of lime into a cellar before the filth could after being launched. The material and workmanship are of be removed. A man, hired at great price, ventured to remove it, but he soon after died In other parts of the hill putrifying hides were found; a vast amount of spoiled fish were poured into one of the docks, > which tended to increase the strength of the epidemic The visitation in 1802 was not severe in Boston That in 1819, though not much over one hundred perished, led to a panic almost as great as in 1798 the authorities, to prevent communication with the places where the epidemic was raging, boarded up some of the streets. In 1835 there were a few cases, but it did not assume the form of an epidemic Indeed, its ravages here have been light, as compared with the small-pox, which, in 1720, carried off onetenth of the population of the city, then probably

The United States and the Sound Dues - What is to be Done ?
From the London Examiner, August 28.

The United States government is adding to the troubles and difficulties of Europe, by insisting on freedom for its shipping in the Baltic from the Sound dues. For that purpose it terminated, some years since, its Commercial Treaty with Denmark. And now, after breaking off the negotiations it had for some years carried on with the Danish government. with a view to indemnifying that State for the abolition of the dues so far as they bore on American vessels, it insists that its citizens are no longer subject to the toll, and peremptorily refuses any such indemnification.

For this last step, perhaps Denmark has herself in some measure to blame. She has long been aware of the United States claim for non-liability except by virtue of the treaty which has been terminated; and she chose to enter into negotiations with the United States agents for the abandonment and extinction of all pretension to levy these dues on American commerce, on the principle of compensation by the United States. But having consented to negotiate, the Danish government never evinced any sincerity or earnestness in the negotiations; and thus giving cause to the United States government to complain of Danish procrastination and tergiversation, that government now pushes its pretensions of exemption to their extreme limit, and refuses either to pay the dues, or to make any compensation for their non-

Denmark has doubtless some excuse for her insecurity in these discussions with the United States. For the last seven years she has had domestic affairs of her own so troublesonie, as to leave her but little nclination to come to close quarters with any trans-Atlantic State on any question it was possible to escape from. The Sound dues, moreover, yield Denmark a considerable revenue, which her exchequer was far from being able to trifle with; and though the American case for exemption was based upon principles which no European government can advance, the non-payment of these dues by any one of the maritime powers, would sooner or later lead to their complete abolition, and the question of the quantum of compensation paid by one, would of course very much govern the amount of indemnity to be given by the rest. But it now matters little what motives may have swayed the Danish government. The United States government asserts that its shipping is not liable to pay these dues; it announces that it will not submit to their exaction from American vessels; and it has withdrawn its offer of indemnification for the abolition of the toll. The case put forward is exceedingly simple. It disclaims all proscriptive right on the part of Denmark to levy these dues on American shipping; their payment was, it is argued, a mere temporary treaty concession by the United States; and that treaty having been terminated in conformity with its provisions, Denmark cannot lawfully claim a shilling from American ships passing through the Sound or the Belt. Such a position, it is obvious, is one that no maritime state of Europe could assume. All that Europe can urge against the toll is the character of its origin its inconsistency with modern usage, sound fiscal principles and free navigation; and the injustice of a State deriving revenue from commerce in which it generally has no interest. But Europe is bound by ancient prescription, by old treaties and by modern regulations of the tariff. She may address Denmark on the expediency, but she cannot deny the right. The maritime owners may indeed urge that the United States inherited the obligation when they became independent; but that position will of course be contested and denied at Washington, and it is one that will never be settled, however much it may be debated. The true and only solution of the whole juestion, and of all its difficulties, is the abolition of ne Sound dues for the purposes of Danish revenue, and their limitation to the expenses of lights, buoys, &c. But however feasible in times of peace this project might be, on the principle of purchase by the maritime States, it is hopeless to expect that in time of war the Sound dues can be brought up in this way. What, then, if Denmark insist by force on American vessels paying them, and the United States government insist by force on the untaxed and untolled passage through the Sound and the Belt ?-What is to be done in that event ?

From the Pennsylvanian. British Agitators and British Slavery. No phase of the anti-slavery excitement in this country presents a more startling aspect than the fact that much of this excitement is the direct result of the interference of British agitators. It is not only the fanatics of London that come here to arouse evil passions and to prompt to violence and death; other influences, of a more secret and therefore more dangerous character, are set in motion to divide and destroy. The articles of the Englsh press, framed in an affected spirit of frankness and apprehension for our destiny, are among the most fatal of these nsidious poisons. Copied into our leading papers because of a few apparently candid expressions, they all, more or less pander to the abolition organizations, and by deploring the existence of slavery, suggest the means and the manner of putting an end to that institution in the South. Any one ordinary observant of this state of things, cannot fail to have marked the tone and temper of the British press, while referring to this subject. The rapidity and frequency of intercourse between this country and Great Britain furnish to the latter the most desirable opportunities for the establishment of a system of assaults upon our Union-a system that runs, we have no doubt, through every variety of manoeuvres and intriguesthat enlists hosts of auxiliaries, each aiding the other unawares-that includes diplomats, merchants and

Our nation is already her rival, and unless this glorious confederacy is broken to pieces, not many years will elapse before we become the masters of the commerce of the world. To this unpromising future for England, the No one ventured to offer words of sympathy, for it British ministers are compelled to direct their attention.
